Spending by the so-called “Big Six” committees totaled $13.3 million in 2017 but the amount was dwarfed by independent special interest spending, according to an analysis by the New Jersey Election Law Enforcement Commission (ELEC).

Independent groups spent $47.5 million on last year’s election, more than triple the sum spent by the two state parties and four legislative leadership committees. The governor’s seat and all 120 legislative seats were up for reelection.

“Party committees are now regularly out-gunned by independent groups during New Jersey’s statewide elections,” said Jeff Brindle, ELEC’s Executive Director.

In 2007, Big Six committees spent 142 times more than independent groups in the election. By 2017, independent committees spent more than three times the Big Six total. Of the total amount spent by the two groups, the 22 percent share by the Big Six was its lowest ever.

If the 2009 Big Six spending total is adjusted for inflation, the $13.3 million spent by Big Six committees in 2017 also is the lowest sum spent in the last decade except for 2015, when just the state Assembly faced reelection.

“Traditional committees used by the two major parties to raise funds for New Jersey elections seem to be in relentless decline. Legislative reforms are needed to try to reverse this trend and create a more balanced electoral landscape,” he said.

While independent groups usually are aligned with one of the two parties, they legally must operate outside the control of party leaders. Unlike the party committees, they face no contribution limits, and, under current state law, they are less accountable because they can hide where they get their money.

“Party committees are more accountable and transparent. That is why political contributors need to be encouraged to go back to supporting parties directly,” Brindle said.

“Some independent groups should be commended because they have voluntarily disclosed their contributions in recent elections. But the fact is, New Jersey’s law is so antiquated that nearly all $114 million spent independently since 2007 could have been done with zero donor disclosure,” Brindle said.

*Spending may exceed fundraising due to use of reserves. **Cash-on-hand adjusted for debts owed to or by the committee.

Compared to 2013, the last year when the governors seat and both houses faced reelection, Democratic fundraising, spending and cash reserves showed improvement. Republican numbers have declined since the 2013 election.

Brindle said members of both parties have expressed support for ELEC-recommended legislation that could strengthen party committees.

Among the changes: raising the size of contributions that party committees can accept, exempting parties from pay-to-play restrictions, and requiring independent committees to fully disclose their campaign finance activities in New Jersey.

“We are hoping the new administration will seriously consider these changes and we will continue to work with both parties to bring about these needed reforms,” said Brindle.

State parties and legislative leadership committees are required to report their financial activity to the Commission on a quarterly basis.
