With fall elections looming, county political parties are sitting on a collective cash reserve of nearly $2.8 million after the first six months of 2018, an 86 percent increase from four years earlier, according to reports filed with the NJ Election Law Enforcement Commission (ELEC).

Unlike last year, when the ballot featured campaigns for governor and all 120 legislative seats, this fall features contests for a US Senate seat, 12 congressional seats, five legislative seats (special elections to fill vacancies) and multiple local offices.

While both parties have shown modest improvement in fund-raising since 2014, what stands out is the fact that they are sitting on a hoard of cash after a major election year.

Democratic cash-on-hand is up 123 percent to $2.1 million. Republicans have stashed away $640,560, or 21 percent more. The combined $2.8 million total is the largest cash-on-hand at the six-month juncture since at least 2008.

“With one of only two gubernatorial campaigns nationally last year, national parties poured a substantial sum into county party warchests, particularly on the Democratic side,” said Jeff Brindle, ELEC’s Executive Director. “Party leaders may have held onto some of that cash because this fall’s federal races are expected to be competitive.”

Compared to 2014, Democrats are having more success with fund-raising than Republicans, perhaps because it is the first time in eight years that their party has controlled both the governor’s seat and both legislative houses.

One thing that has helped is that Democratic congressional candidates have shared more of their campaign funds with county parties than Republican candidates over the past three years.

Democratic candidates have contributed at least $335,571 to county parties during that period, while Republicans have ponied up $264,323. So far this year, Democrats have contributed $61,900 while Republicans have given $24,360 to their respective parties.

Even with their improved fortunes, fundraising pales compared to earlier years before parties faced stiffer competition from independent special interest groups and public contractors were allowed to make much larger contributions.

For instance, in 2004, also a non-election year, county parties raised $6.3 million during the first two quarters- more than twice this year’s haul.

Brindle said legislation recommended by ELEC could make it easier for state and county parties to raise money while shifting funds away from independent special interest groups that dominate federal, state and even local elections. Another advantage, he said, is that parties are far more transparent than many independent groups.

“We hope legislative leaders this fall will take up bipartisan ELEC recommendations that could reinvigorate the parties while putting the brakes on the rapid growth of independent groups,” Brindle said.

Among the Democratic county committees that filed their latest reports, Bergen, Camden, Essex, Gloucester, Passaic and Union Counties reported cash-on-hand larger than $100,000. Burlington and Hudson Counties reported a negative net worth, meaning they owe more than their cash reserves.
